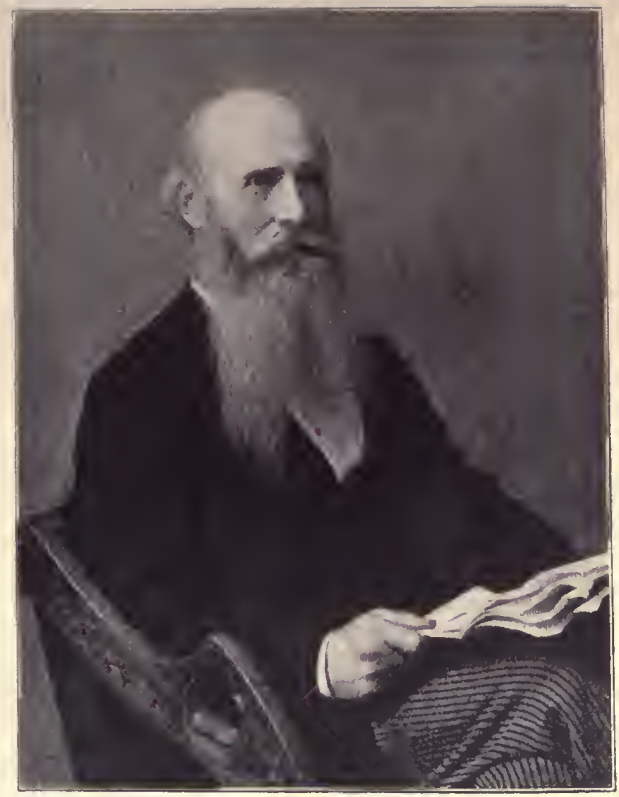
THE OXFORD DICTIONARY

A BRIEF ACCOUNT

SIR JAMES MURRAY—IN MEMORIAM

[The following note was prefixed to the section of the ninth volume of A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles, containing the words STANDARD—STEAD, which was published on October 1, 1915.]

'SIR JAMES MURRAY died on the 26th July, 1915. His great wish that he should live to finish the Dictionary on his eightieth birthday, in 1917, has not been fulfilled; the unceasing labour of three and thirty years has ended when less than a tenth part of the work remains to be done. Almost within a week of his death he was still hard at work, showing, as Dr. Bradley wrote of a visit made to him, "not a little of the zest and mental lucidity that I remembered of old". In the preceding months, while barely convalescent from an illness that seemed to bring him to the gates of death, he had prepared, and at the appointed date of July 1 published, his usual "double section". "The words contained in it", Dr. Bradley says, "present an extraordinary number of difficult problems, which are handled with the editor's characteristic sagacity and resource; the section is a piece of his work of which he might be proud."



'It has always been the rule that each of the editors should be exclusively responsible for the portions of the Dictionary issued under his name. The sections in the hands of Dr. BRADLEY, Dr. CRAIGIE, Mr. ONIONS, and their staffs, will not be affected. But Sir JAMES MURRAY at the beginning laid the lines and drew the plan; in the prosecution of the work, when it became clear that it must be shared, his amazing capacity for unremitting labour enabled him to take more than an equal part, and the volumes produced by himself show characteristic excellences which cannot be exactly matched, though they may be rivalled by merits of another kind. He will not write the last pages, but more than that of any other man his name will be associated with the long and efficient working of the great engine of research by which the Dictionary has been produced.'

Announcing Sir James Murray's death The Periodical said : 'Born at Denholm near Hawick in 1837, he had a successful career as a teacher before finally devoting himself to his great undertaking. The agreement with the Clarendon Press was signed on March 1, 1879; in 1882 the first instalment of copy was sent to the printers, and in February 1884 the first part of the Dictionary was published, consisting of 352 pages and containing the words from A to Ant. In the thirty-three years during which his working-days (usually very long days) were exclusively devoted to the actual production of the Dictionary, Sir James Murray and his staff succeeded in dealing with more than half of the English vocabulary, comprising all the words beginning with the letters A–D, H–K, O–P, and all but a fraction of those beginning with T. Four complete volumes, and portions of three others, are the results of this unceasing labour, and extend to a total of no less than 7,138 pages—an average of nearly 220 pages a year. Even if an inevitable increase in the scale of the work is allowed for, this will in the end amount to about one-half of the entire Dictionary. It is doubtful whether any one who has not had experience of similar work can appreciate the steady effort required to produce such a result.'

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF THE DICTIONARY

The Proposed 'Supplement' of 1859

The collection of the materials which are used in the preparation of the Oxford Dictionary began in 1857 with the appointment by the Philological Society in London of a committee for the collection of words unregistered in existing dictionaries. Dr. Trench, then Dean of Westminster, read before the Society two papers in which, 'while speaking with much appreciation of the labours of Dr. Johnson and his successors, he declared that these labours yet fell far short of giving us the ideal English Dictionary. Especially, he pointed out that for the history of words and families of words, and for the changes of form and sense which words had historically passed through, they gave hardly any help whatever. No one could find out from all the dictionaries extant how long any particular word had been in the language, which of the many senses in which many words were used was the original, or how or when these many senses had been developed; nor, in the case of words described as obsolete, were we told when they became obsolete or by whom they were last used. He pointed out also that the obsolete and the rarer words of the language had never been completely collected; that thousands of words current in the literature of the past three centuries had escaped the diligence of Johnson and all his supplementers; that, indeed, the collection of the requisite material for a complete dictionary could not be compassed by any one man, however long-lived and however diligent, but must be the work of many collaborators who would undertake systematically to read and to extract English literature. He called upon the Philological Society, therefore, as the only body in England then interesting itself in the language, to undertake the collection of materials to complete the work already done by Bailey, Johnson, Todd, Webster, Richardson, and others, and to prepare a supplement to all the dictionaries, which should register all omitted words and senses, and supply all the historical information in which these works were lacking, and above all, should give quotations illustrating the first and last appearance, and every notable point in the life-history of every word.'[1]

The Preparations for a New Dictionary, 1859–79

The collection of materials for the supplement was at once begun by the Committee and seventy-six volunteers, but it soon became apparent that the projected supplement would be greater than all the existing dictionaries. Accordingly plans were discussed for a New English Dictionary, and Mr. Herbert Coleridge was appointed editor. Under his direction rules were issued for the guidance of volunteer readers, some hundreds of books were read or undertaken to be read, and the editor himself published his Glossarial Index to the printed literature of the thirteenth century. He had prepared lists of words from A to D, and had put into type specimen pages containing articles upon some early words shortly before his lamented death in 1861. He had calculated that, when he had one hundred thousand illustrative quotations in his pigeon-holes, it would be time to begin making the Dictionary.

Dr. Furnivall, who was next appointed editor, 'realized much more fully the immensity of the work'. He pressed on the collection of quotations, divided the letters of the alphabet among volunteer sub-editors, each of whom, it was hoped, would arrange the quotations supplied of words beginning with the letter entrusted to him, classify the different senses of each word, and so leave to the editor only the final redaction of the articles. And, becoming conscious of the great bulk of our early literature which had not been printed, or had been very imperfectly printed, Furnivall founded in 1864 the Early English Text Society, which from that time until now has been engaged in the accurate reproduction of those early writings without which no historical knowledge of English language and literature is possible.

The work thus begun was continued for many years, but could not be brought to completion. The materials accumulated as more books were read, but experience showed that it was impossible for volunteer workers to bring them into a single plan: in the absence of an editor and a staff giving their whole time to the work gaps in the material could not be discovered or filled, and an attempt made by Furnivall to construct a Concise Dictionary, which should show what had been done and what remained to do, broke down after many years of effort. The first enthusiasm of the workers waned when it was found that printing was so far distant; the London and American publishers who were consulted were unable to undertake a work of the magnitude which it was clear would be necessary, and the whole undertaking languished.

The Oxford Dictionary

The collections which had been made were too valuable to be abandoned, and in 1878 it was suggested that the Philological Society should invite the co-operation of the Clarendon Press. Negotiations between the Society, the Press, and Dr. Murray, who was by common consent designated as the editor, were entered into, and agreements were drawn up which were finally settled early in 1879. Even at this time the immensity of the work was not fully realized. The Dictionary, it was thought, 'would occupy not less than 6,000 and not more than 7,000 pages', and it could be completed, it was assumed, in ten years by a single editor, with a small staff. But when Dr. Murray, in 1879, began his work, 'careful examination of the quotations then for the first time collected in one place, and arranged in a continuous alphabetical series, showed that much work still remained to be done in order to render the material adequate for the purpose. Accordingly a new appeal was made to volunteers to collect additional quotations from specified books, of which lists were from time to time issued. More than eight hundred readers in Great Britain, the United States, and elsewhere responded to this appeal, and in the course of three years a million additional quotations were furnished, raising the total number to three and a half millions, selected by about thirteen hundred readers, from the works of more than five thousand authors of all periods. About thirty sub-editors (including a few who have never ceased to work for the Dictionary) offered their gratuitous services in arranging quotations, preparing definitions, and otherwise contributing to the progress of the work. Without the aid of these generous contributors and fellow labourers so great a task could never have been undertaken.'[1]

These immense collections, which even before the printing of the work had begun were already thirty-five times larger than had been contemplated in 1860, would have been sufficient in themselves to ensure the supereminence of the Dictionary. No other book has had, and very few ever will have, foundations laid in an inductive investigation of so wide a character. A simple classification of the available material for the various words, an intelligent selection from it, and a careful verification of the references, would have resulted in producing a work of the greatest value and usefulness. The adoption of such a course, however, which in itself would have involved no small amount of labour, was rendered virtually impossible by the very wealth of the material. This continually raised problems and presented difficulties which had not confronted any previous lexicographer, and the solution of these constantly involved prolonged researches in many different fields of study. A single quotation, containing a rare word or some unusual sense of a word, frequently became the starting-point of an investigation, historical or etymological, which might lead to some interesting discovery and explain something previously unknown or misunderstood. At an early stage of the work it became apparent that such researches, if they were to be adequately carried out, would demand ample limits of time and space, and that satisfactory results could only be achieved by the organization of a large and highly skilled editorial staff, which could have easy access to one or other of the great libraries, and profit by the assistance of many scholars and men of science. To attain this end, Dr. Murray with his staff removed to Oxford in 1885. He was fortunate in the widespread interest which his work excited in this and other countries, and in the many lasting friendships which it made for him. Without the generous help which this interest and these friendships drew from many quarters it would have been almost impossible to collect adequate materials for the Dictionary. The list of voluntary helpers within the British Islands, many of whom have rendered inestimable service, is so extensive that it must be sought in the prefaces to the various volumes; but something may be said here of the assistance which has come from over the seas. In early stages much help was given by American scholars, whose work was organized and superintended by Professor F. A. March, of Lafayette College, Penn. The preface to vol. i (p. xv) records large contributions of materials from several Americans, while here, or in other volumes, the names of Fitzedward Hall, W. C. Minor, A. Matthews, C. W. Ernst, &c., are mentioned among those to whom special recognition is due. In another direction, across the North Sea, Mr. Caland, of Wageningen, was for many years a devoted contributor and critical proof-reader.

MR. C. T. ONIONS.

Even with all the assistance thus freely given, it became evident within a few years from the start that the magnitude of the task undertaken by Sir James Murray had not been fully realized. To hasten the completion of the work additional editors were appointed.

Dr. Bradley, who had previously worked in London, first giving help with the letter B, undertook the editing of E, and removed to Oxford in 1896. Dr. Craigie, who joined the staff at Oxford in 1897, first assisted in the preparation of G, I, and K, and began independent editing with Q. Mr. Onions, after completing ten years of service with Sir James Murray and Dr. Bradley, was engaged in specially preparing portions of M, N, R, and S, and at the beginning of 1914 undertook the independent editing of Su–Sz.

DR. W. A. CRAIGIE.

Thus the editorial list stands at April 1, 1916:

James A. H. Murray, editor of A B C D, H I J K, O P and T.
Henry Bradley, editor of E F G, L M, S–Sh, St–Stead.
William A. Craigie, editor of N, Q, R and Si–Sq.
Charles T. Onions, editor of Su–.

In 1909, in his Letter to the University, Lord Curzon wrote: 'In the staff of the English Dictionary alone the Press contributes to the University what is probably the largest single engine of Research working anywhere at the present time.'

In July 1915 the staff, which had been slightly diminished by various causes, consisted of the following: Sir James Murray, assisted by Mr. A. T. Maling, Mr. F. J. Sweatman, Mr. F. A. Yockney,

Miss E. M. Murray, and Miss R. N. Murray; Dr. Henry Bradley, assisted by Mr. W. Worrall, Mr. H. J. Bayliss, Mr. W. J. Lewis, and Miss E. S. Bradley; Dr. W. A. Craigie, assisted by Mr. L. F. Powell, Mrs. Powell, and Mr. G. Watson; Mr. C. T. Onions, assisted by

Mr. A. T. Maling. Mr. F. J. Sweatman. Mr. F. A. Yockney.

Miss E. M. Murray. Sir J. A. H. Murray. Miss R. N. Murray.

Mr. W. J. Fortune, Mr. P. T. J. Dadley, and Mr. H. R. Simpson. The total number of those engaged in the preparation of the Dictionary was thus nineteen. Three other members of the staff—Mr. G. G. R. Greene, Mr. J. W. Birt, and Mr. E. N. Martin—were serving in His Majesty's Forces.

The Present State of the Dictionary

Including the work of all the editors, the present state of the Oxford Dictionary is as follows. Eight of the ten volumes are complete and, with the portions of the ninth volume already published, carry the vocabulary without a break from A to STEAD. . The remainder of ST– is in progress, as also is SU–, of which two sections have already been issued. T has been completed. About half of V, with which the last half-volume opens, has already been sent to the printers, and the earlier sheets are in a finished state. On April 1, 1916, the Dictionary extends to 13,224 pages and deals with 357,279 words, illustrated by 1,540,040 quotations.

A Comparison with other Dictionaries

The seventh volume containing the words beginning with the letters O and P contains more words than any volume published so far. The total is 48,870 words—30,300 main words, 6,393 subordinate words, 4,974 special combinations, and 7,203 obvious combinations. Of the main words, 23,120 are described as current, 5,335 as obsolete, and 1,845 as alien. As against the Oxford total of 48,870, no other English dictionary contains more than 27,097. No fewer than 38,365 words in the Oxford volume are illustrated by quotations—no other English dictionary has more than 8,368 words, roughly 30,000 fewer, illustrated by quotations, and the illustrative quotations themselves number 175,130 in the Oxford book or 154,790 more than in any other comparable volume. Johnson's dictionary contained 4,485 words beginning with O and P, of which 3,661 were illustrated by quotations, the quotations numbering 12,111.

The unfinished volumes of the Oxford Dictionary are the ninth and tenth, and a comparison shows that in these its superiority in the number of words and the wealth of illustrative quotations is more than maintained. The ninth volume Si–Thyzle is complete to Stead, and Su–Sullen, T–Thyzle are also published; these together contain 34,507 words as against 16,090 in the next largest English dictionary; 30,106 words are illustrated by quotations as against 5,235, and the number of quotations is 178,788 as against 14,678. In the tenth volume the words Ti–Tz have been published. They number 16,650, of which 13,372 are illustrated by quotations, and the total of quotations is 63,026. No other English dictionary contains in this portion more than 8,355 words, or 3,061 illustrated by quotations, or more than 6,550 quotations.

As stated, the number of pages published to April 1, 1916, is 13,224. Each page contains three columns $10\frac{1}{4}$ inches long (112 lines on the average), and each column is $2\frac{3}{8}$ inches wide. Basing calculations on the type most employed of the several varieties in use, and assuming that the pages are all full, we may estimate that there have been published some 39,672 columns, which if placed end to end would cover over 6 miles; the 4,443,264 lines of type therein (166 miles) containing 194,483,296 letters and figures, not counting punctuation marks.

The Progress of Foreign Dictionaries—A Contrast

The number of years which have been required to bring the Oxford Dictionary to this point will not seem excessive when it is compared with three foreign dictionaries which in respect of plan and extent may fairly be said to rival it. These are the Deutsches Wörterbuch, begun by the brothers Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, the Woordenbock der nederlandsche Taal, begun by De Vries and Te Winkel, and the Ordbok öfver svenska språket of the Swedish Academy. A summary of the past progress and present state of these works affords interesting evidence of the time which is normally spent in the production of dictionaries of this kind.

German

The preparatory work for the Deutsches Wörterbuch was begun by the brothers Grimm in 1838, but the printing did not commence till the very end of 1851; the first volume, containing A–Biermolke, was completed in 1854. Wilhelm Grimm, who died in 1859, did only the letter D, which forms part of the second volume; Jacob completed the third volume in 1862, and had advanced some way into the fourth at the time of his death in 1863. Since that date the work has been carried on by various scholars, some twenty in all, eight of whom are specially mentioned in some forms of the general title-page as it appears on the covers of the separate parts. During these fifty-two years the dictionary has progressed from F to an advanced point in S, though part of G still remains to be done. The rest of the alphabet is represented chiefly by continuous portions of T, V, and W, with smaller unconnected sections of S, U, V, W, and Z; most of these minor sections have been produced within the past three years, as the result of a special effort to complete the work. With the exception of Vol. IV (which is immensely out of proportion with the others), the first nine volumes are finished, and carry the work as far as Seele. Vol. X is also well advanced, and considerable progress has been made with three of the six remaining volumes. The total result of sixty-three years of printing and publishing amounts to 20,174 pages (equivalent, however, to little more than 10,000 pages of the Oxford Dictionary), and covers about five-sixths of the whole German vocabulary.

Dutch

The beginnings of the Dutch dictionary date from 1850–51, and by 1852 the two original editors, De Vries and Te Winkel, had started the systematic collection of materials for the work. It was not, however, till 1864 that the first part made its appearance. After the death of Te Winkel in 1868 De Vries continued the work with various colleagues until his own death in 1892; since that date the dictionary has been carried on by some of these colleagues and by other editors subsequently appointed. After fifty-one years of publication the present state of the Woordenboek is as follows: Vols. I–VI, containing A to I, are complete with the exception of the latter part of Vol. III, and Vols. IX–XI, containing M to O, have also been finished. Of the remainder, Vol. VIII has made considerable progress, while Vols. VII, XII, and XIII are less advanced; the latter, ending at present with RIANT, is the furthest point the dictionary has reached. The portion of the work now published amounts to 12,565 pages (equal to less than 5,000 pages of the Oxford Dictionary), and contains about three-fifths of the Dutch vocabulary.

Swedish

The dictionary of the Swedish Academy is much less advanced than either of the above. The first part appeared in 1893, and up to the present time three complete volumes have been published, with portions of another two. These, however, contain only the letters A, B (incomplete), C, and D (incomplete); fully five-sixths of the Swedish vocabulary still remain to be dealt with.

The Low Price of the Dictionary

In order to make the Oxford Dictionary accessible to scholars and students it is published at a price which is at least as low as that for any printed matter sold in book form. The price of a single section of 64 pages is only 2*s.* 6*d.* net (in the United States 60 cents), or less than one half-penny a page. The entire work so far as it has gone—the first eight volumes bound in half-morocco, and the sections of Vols. IX and X in paper boards—can be purchased for £27 net. Particulars are given on the two pages next following.

HUMPHREY MILFORD

Public Recognition

Her Majesty Queen Victoria graciously accepted the dedication of the Oxford Dictionary in the year 1897. The Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths in 1905 contributed £5,000 towards the cost of Volume VI.

Recent reviews and special articles show clearly how much the Dictionary has helped to advance the historical study of English, not merely as a matter of exact philology but as a subject of general interest. It is perhaps in this respect, in its exhibition of the language as a living and growing thing closely connected with the history of the nation, that it will yet have its greatest value for the British Empire and the whole English-speaking race. As examples, quotations may be made from two articles—one from the The New Statesman and one from The Times :

'Large dictionaries are something more than works of reference. "Neither is a dictionary a bad book to read", as Emerson remarked; he put it low, for a large dictionary is first-class reading. Murray's would be as good a companion on a desert island as a man could hope for, as, apart from the interest of the history of the words, the quotations are endlessly entertaining in themselves. It is like having all the birthday books and literary calendars ever written rolled into one.'—The New Statesman.

'We owe an immense debt to the Oxford Dictionary; it has corrected many etymologies, rectified numberless errors, and brought to light an almost overwhelming amount of historical and linguistic knowledge. But what is of even more general interest is the impression we derive from its pages of the vitality of our speech, of its perpetual growth, of the energy it possesses and continually manifests in the creation of novel forms. We give so much of our time to the study of dead languages that we are apt to regard our own language as one of these, with a vocabulary and grammar immutably fixed and settled. But in the Oxford Dictionary, where the appearance of each new word and idiom is accurately dated, we are now able to observe English as a living language, ever developing and changing as it keeps pace with new developments of life and thought. If indeed we wish to trace the history of different periods and study their innovations and new ideas, we can find these dated with curious accuracy by the appearance of the new words in which they are embodied. For just as the archæologist, when he excavates the site of some ancient city, finds the various forms of its civilization arranged in chronological strata, so we find evidences of each past generation and its activities in the superimposed strata of our vocabulary.'—The Times.

In the corresponding portion of Richardson's Dictionary the number of quotations is 10,964.

The aggregate numbers for the first nine volumes of the Dictionary (A–TH) are:

Main words.	Subordinate words.	Special Combinations.	Obvious Combinations.	Total No. of words.	Illustrative quotations.
206,565	56,114	41,186	49,905	353,770	1,547,545

Of the 206,565 Main words 181,067 are current, 20,513 obsolete, 4985 alien.

For observations on the etymological and other characteristics of the words included in this volume, and for detailed statistics of the numbers of words of various classes, and of the numbers of quotations, the reader is referred to the separate prefaces to the various sections. A summary statement of the characteristics of the portions SI–ST, SU–SZ will be found in the prefaces to them; observations relating to T–TH are included in the preface to the letter T in Part II.

The statistics for the whole of the letter S are collected at the end of the preface to SU–SZ.

PREFACE TO SI—ST.

THIS half-volume, containing the words from SI to the end of ST, includes 13,563 Main words, 3502 Combinations explained under these, and 3532 Subordinate entries; in all 20,597. The Obvious combinations, illustrated by quotations but not requiring specific definition, number 6781 more, making a total of 27,378. Of the Main words, 2683 are marked † as obsolete, and 395 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.*

In the portion comprising SI to SQ the distribution of the usual constituents of the vocabulary is considerably affected by the sound immediately following the initial s. The native element, however, is either predominant or prominent throughout, except in SK and a portion of SL. The contributions made by the other Germanic languages are as usual slight in comparison; Scandinavian is best represented in SK (e.g. skill, skin, sky) and SL (e.g. slaughter, slight, sly), Dutch or Low German in SK, SL, and especially in SP. The Romanic element, from all sources, is important throughout, except in SM and in parts of SL and SP;

* The following figures show the comparative scale of this work and some other Dictionaries:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Here.
Words recorded	2114	9763	12,743	27,378
Words illustrated by quotations	1648	3497	3835	23,959
Number of illustrative quotations	7351	5884	11,433	156,397

words directly from Latin are naturally absent from SK. The number of words from Old French is considerably increased by the reduction of prefixes, and by the frequency with which s- appears in place of the usual OF. es-. The Greek element is important only in SO and SP, but is slightly represented in the other portions, even in SQ through med.L. forms. Words from Oriental and remote languages are under the average, and in some portions are almost entirely absent. Some feeling of appropriateness in the use of sk-, sl-, sm-, etc., to express certain ideas is evidently responsible for the large proportion of words beginning with these sounds which have no obvious etymology. This is especially apparent in recent (or comparatively late) formations, such as skedaddle, slang, slog, slum, smash, snob, snooze, etc. Equal obscurity of origin, however, attaches to many older words which have long been established in the language, as skewer, skull, slender, smell, smoulder, smug, snatch, sneak, sneer, snug, etc.

Although SI–SQ includes a large number of words in very common use, there are very few articles of unusual length, and the great majority are comparatively short. The longest (of 15 columns) is that on SO; next to this come those on SIT, SPEAK, SPRING sb., SIDE, and SPIRIT. A few extend to 8 or 9 columns, as SILVER, SMALL, SOFT, SOUL, SPRING v., but the average length of the longer articles is not above 5 or 6 columns. Extensive illustration of forms has been found necessary only in a few verbs, as sit, slay, smite, but the possibilities of English orthography are strikingly brought out by the numerous spellings of soldier and sovereign.

In the ST portion, all the principal linguistic sources of the English vocabulary—Old English, French, Latin, and Greek—are abundantly represented. The great majority of the words can be referred to a small number of Indogermanic roots, and it is observable that sometimes derivatives of one and the same root have come into the language through all the different channels. Thus the root st(h)ā-* has its representatives, among native English words, in stand, staddle, ? staff, stead, stool, stow, and others; among words introduced from Latin and French, in stable, state, station, statue, etc.; among words from Greek, in stater[1], static, statical, etc. Words from the modern Teutonic and Romanic languages are numerous. On the other hand, the adoptions from the native languages of Asia, Africa, and America, which abound in many parts of the Dictionary, are here almost entirely absent.

Many of the words with initial st are remarkable for the great variety of their senses, requiring for their treatment articles of exceptional length. Among these may be mentioned stand (which with its derivatives here occupies 19 pages), strike (and the related stroke), stick vb. and sbs., stone; also, of Romanic and Latin origin, stage, standard, state, station, strive, study, style.

The material collected for SI to ST down to 1881–2 was subedited at that time as follows:—SI to SOMYR by Mr. P. W. Jacob, SON to SPECIES by Mr. Walter Browne, SPECIFIABLE to SPYTE by Mr. Charles Gray, SQ- and ST- by Mr. P. W. Jacob. SI- to SK- was re-subedited, and new material incorporated, in 1906–8 by Mr. J. Bartlett, B.A., SLA- to SOLF- in 1904–7 by Mr. John Dormer, SOLI- to SONN- in 1908 by Mr. J. Bartlett, and SPA- to SPIS- in 1905–6 by Mr. C. B. Winchester.

For information on special points grateful acknowledgement is made to Professors S. H. Vines, W. H. Perkin, A. E. H. Love, P. Studer, and J. A. Smith, Oxford; Dr. R. L. Of the Main words, 723 are marked † as obsolete, and 83 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

The following figures exhibit the result of comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries:—

The following prefatory notes have been issued with the separate sections:—

Si—Simple. In this section the native element has a clear preponderance, and includes a large proportion of words which go back to Old or early Middle English, and are still in common use, or survive in dialect. Among the more important of these are sib, sick, sicker, sickle, side, sieve, sift, sigh, sight, silk, sill, silly, silver, with numerous derivative forms, as sicken, sickly, sideling(s, sightless, silken, silvern. Those which take up most space are SIDE sb.[1] (11 columns) and SILVER sb. (8½ columns), and each of these is followed by a long series of derivatives or combinations (occupying 15 and 8½ columns respectively). The obscure words which appear to be of English origin are not numerous; the chief are siddow, sillabub, and simmer (earlier simper). The Scandinavian element is very slight, and almost entirely confined to dialect words, as sile sb.[2] and sb.[3], sile v.[2], sime, and simmon sb.[2]; it is doubtful whether silt should be reckoned here.

The Romanic words, though occupying less space than the native, are neither few nor unimportant. In addition to the Latin words which have been adopted without change of form, as siler, silex, silicula, siliqua, simia, simile, there are many which have passed through Old French, or have been assimilated to the usual types, as sibilant, siccative, sidereal, sigil, sign, significance, signify, silence, silent, similar, similitude, simoniac, simony, and other derivatives from the same bases as these. More distinctively French in origin are sice (six), siecle, siege, siffle, signal, signet, signory, simnel, and simple; the earlier uses of simple are difficult to separate clearly. Italian has contributed sienna, signor, signora, signoria, and Spanish sierra, siesta, and silo. From Greek, usually through Latin, have come Sibyl, siderite, sidero-[1], sigma (whence sigmatic, sigmoid, etc.), Silen(us, silphium, silurus, and simosaur(us.

Of the words introduced from India, Sikh and simool are native; sicca, sidi, and silladar are ultimately of Arabic origin, as are also sief and simoom. Siamang is Malay, and simaruba has come from Guiana. Names of peoples or places are represented by Siamese (with a curious development as adj. and vb.), Siberian, Sicilian, Sidonian, Silesia(n, Sillery, and Silurian.

Some historical interest attaches to side-bar, side(s)man, siege-piece, sign-board, sign-manual, sign-post, silhouette, silly-how, Simeonite, and Simon Pure.

Simple—Sleep. This portion contains the second half of the words beginning with SI-, the whole of those with initial SK-, and about a third part of those beginning with SL-; in addition to these, SJ- is represented by the word sjambok. Each of the three main divisions has special characteristics, and the two later in particular present some interesting etymological features. The space occupied by the SI- words is almost equally divided between those of native and those of foreign origin. The former include many common words, such as sin, since (with the older sith, sithen, sithence), sinew, sing, sink, sister, sit (rich both in forms and senses), six; of the others the Latin element is the largest and most important, although there are also considerable contributions from French, Greek, and some more remote sources.

A complete contrast to this is presented by the pages containing the Sk- words, in which both the Old English and the Latin element are conspicuously absent, since OE. sc- gave later Sh-, while Latin Sc- remained unchanged. The actual sources are very varied; among the leading words may be noted the Scandinavian skald, skate (fish), ski (a very recent adoption), skill, skin, skirt, skoal, skulk, sky, the Dutch or Low German skate (for ice), skellum, sketch, skink, skipper, skive, the Old French skein, skellat, skiff, skim, skirmish, the Gaelic skene, the Greek skeleton, skiagram, skink (lizard), and the American skunk. The neighbouring languages afford no clear explanation of a certain number, as skewer, skid, skillet, skittle, skull.

In the Sl- portion native words reappear, such as slack (with its derived verbs slacken, slake, sleak, and sleck), slade, slay (with a remarkable variety of forms), sleave, sledge (hammer), sleek, sleep. They are, however, outnumbered by the foreign Teutonic element, e.g. the Scand. slack (dell), slam, slaughter, slaver, and the LG., Du., or Flem. slabber, slag, slap, sled, sledge. In a few common words the sl- represents earlier scl- from OF. escl-, as in slander, slash, slat, slate, slave. Of obscure origin are slab sb.[1], slang sb.[3], slattern, sleazy.

Among words of miscellaneous interest, in addition to many of those specified above, may be mentioned sincanter, sindon, sinople, si quis, sir, sirdar, sirloin, sisera ry, skedaddle, Skimmington, skirret, and slate v.[2]

Sleep—Sniggle. The words contained in this portion comprise about two-thirds of those beginning with Sl-, the whole of Sm-, and fully half of Sn-. Among the words with initial Sl- and Sm-, which occupy about five-sixths of the space, those which are clearly or presumably of native origin are by far the most numerous and important, and include many in common use, such as sleep, sleeve, slide, slime, slink, slow, small, smart, smear, smile, smith, smooth, etc., together with many derivative forms. The relationship between variant forms of the same word, or different formations from the same root, is often interesting, as in the cases of sleuth and sloth, slew and slough, smack and smatch, smeech and smeek, smoke and smook, smeeth and smooth, etc. It is curious that smell, occurring very early in ME., is not recorded in OE., and not found in any of the cognate languages. The close connexion between English and Frisian is illustrated by their common use of sleeve, for which all the remaining Teutonic languages have other designations.

A considerable number of words in Sl- and Sm- are apparently of Flem., Du., or LG. origin, the proportion being larger than usual. Clear instances are sleigh, slim (recently re-adopted in a special sense), sloop, slot sb.[1], slump sb.[1]; those in Sm- are more uncertain, but the probabilities are in favour of this source for smack sb.[2] and v.[2], smelt v., smile, smuggle, and smut.

Words of Scand. origin are chiefly prominent in Sl-, where they include the related sleight, sloyd, and sly, sleuth (mainly surviving in sleuth-hound), slight, sling v.[1], and slug. In Sm- the only important instance is smithy, a northern word rarely used by southern writers before the 19th century.

Most of the important words not clearly assignable to one or other of the above classes have some obscurity attaching to their origin. The majority are old, as slender, slouch, slough (skin, etc.), sloven, slur sb.[1], slut, smatter, smoulder (once almost extinct, but revived by Scott), smudge, and smug. A few are more recent, as the nautical slew or slue, and the (originally) slang or colloquial slog, slum, smash.

From other sources there are very few notable words. OF. has contributed slice, slot sb.[2] and sb.[3], sluice, and smalt. Greek is represented by smaragd, smectic, smegma, and some related forms. Slogan is from Sc. Gaelic, and one of its early forms has given rise to a poetic misunderstanding (see slug-horn).

In Sn- the number of important native words is much smaller, the chief being snail, snake, and sneeze (an alteration of the earlier fnese). Of Scand. origin are snag, snare, sneap, and snib v.[1] The most interesting adoptions from Du., etc., are snaphance and snickersnee; the origin of the latter is now made clear by the evidence of the early forms. The proportion of words not clearly represented in other languages (some of them obviously imitative) is fairly large, as snaffle, snatch, sneak, sneck, sneer, sniff, snigger, etc.
